The economic system under apartheid was not capitalism, but “ statism. ” The government incentives favored companies perceived as crucial to alleviating the negative effects of sanctions.

The Myth of South African Capitalism | Cato Institute

The Apartheid government was certainly not socialist, as it opposed equality, but it had a definite dash of nationalist socialism in there. It is a stretch to call the former regime fascist but clearly the State played a proactive and big role in the economy. Capitalism requires, specifically, the absence of the State in the market.

7 Reasons Why Apartheid Was Not 'Capitalist' - Rational ...

Conventionally, Apartheid is regarded as no more than an intensification of the earlier policy of Segregation and is ascribed simplistically to the particular racial ideology of the ruling Nationalist Party. In this article substantial differences between Apartheid and Segregation are identified and explained by reference to the changing relations of capitalist and African pre-capitalist modes of production.

Capitalism and cheap labour-power in South Africa: from ...

The same is not impossible in South Africa, not between whites and blacks, but between two major black groups, the Zulus and Xhosa. Loads of Americans, from civil-rights organizations and college students to politicians, were involved in the anti-apartheid movement. One wonders how much they care about what happens in South Africa after apartheid.

South Africa's War against Capitalism | Cato Institute

The phrase racial capitalism first emerged in the context of the anti-Apartheid and southern African liberation struggles in the 1970s. “ Cedric Robinson neither invented nor coined ‘ racial capitalism. ’ ” The phrase “ racial capitalism ” is suddenly everywhere. Not so long ago it was a largely obscure, academic term.

Racial Capitalism, Black Liberation, and South Africa ...

In his diagnosis of racial capitalism — a lens that describes a great deal in both present-day South Africa and Israel-Palestine — the American academic Cedric Robinson writes that capitalism uses systems of oppression like apartheid to evolve and maintain dominance. Since capitalism was created in an environment already infused with racism (that is, Western Europe), it is only logical for the system to grow dependent on slavery, violence, imperialism, and genocide.
