Abstract. Assertion-based treatments for stuttering have historically been more popular than evidence-based treatments. In this paper it is argued that the use of evidence-based treatments for stuttering is professionally empowering for clinicians, but that the use of assertion-based treatments is a circular process that inhibits professional development.

Evidence-based practice also specifies a general approach, not a dependent variable or a particular treatment program; an evidence-based approach to the treatment of stuttering does not, in itself, require using percent syllables stuttered as a treatment outcome measure or require the use of behavioral or fluency-shaping treatments (see Ingham & Cordes, 1997, Ingham & Riley, 1998). As described above and in other sources, evidence-based practice actually involves all the complexities of ...

An evidence-based framework can be described as an empirically-driven, measurement-based, client-sensitive approach for selecting treatments. It is believed that using such a framework is more likely to result in a clinically significant outcome. For this paper, a clinically significant outcome was defined as a meaningful treatment change.
