The current legal position in most of the world is that explicit written consent from a man must be obtained prior to death for his sperm to be collected and used posthumously. According to a commentary published in Reproductive Biomedicine and Society Online,¹ a standard of presumed consent should be adopted in posthumous sperm conception.

There is much discussion in ethics literature about the interpretation of best interests. If a wide interpretation is given to “best interests” then the interests of those other than the patient may be taken into account in determining the interests of the patient and there is a danger of moving away from the patient as a focus for legal / ethical decision-making.

~~UKCEN: Ethical Issues – Consent~~

Ethics does not, therefore, provide a simple system which will provide the ‘right’ answer when faced with any dilemma in prescribing practice. It is the starting point for the debate rather than its neat and tidy conclusion. Professional practice in healthcare in the modern world requires the balancing of complex competing needs and interests.
