This obsession led young Harryhausen to his first serious attempt at a movable model, of a cave bear, then to a teen friendship with Ray Bradbury and Forrest J. Ackerman of Famous Monsters of Filmland fame, some mentoring by King Kong effects wizard Willis O'Brien and his first special effects job, with George Pal. The book, co-written with film historian Dalton, goes on to cover each of Harryhausen's major films in tremendous detail, with great attention to the technical side of stop-motion ...

This is Harryhausen 's second book, following the slim, technically deficient Film Fantasy Scrapbook — which first appeared in 1972, with revisions in 1974 and 1981 — a mostly-pictorial guide to creatures that have populated the effects maestro 's films. An Animated Life towers over that. The book is part confessional — revealing techniques never previously divulged by their creator — and part love letter to a craft that Harryhausen describes in meticulous prose as ' dimensional ...

Ray Harryhausen—Wikipedia

The Valley of Gwangi was the last dinosaur-themed film that Harryhausen animated, and he made much use of his experience in depicting extinct animals from his earlier films. Close to a year was spent on the special effects (there were more than 300 'Dynamation' cuts in the film, a record number for Harryhausen), with the roping of Gwangi being the most labor-intensive animated sequence.
